Introduction.

This document presents the final activity of the Business English I course, corresponding to Unit 3, Activity 3: Presenting an Elevator Pitch. The main objective of this activity is to demonstrate the ability to communicate a business idea effectively, clearly, and concisely in English, simulating a real situation in front of investors or potential customers. The elevator pitch is an essential tool in the business world because it allows professionals to capture attention in less than two minutes and generate interest in a project, product, or service. In my case, I have developed an innovative idea to improve the work environment and reduce stress among employees, especially in high-pressure settings such as financial advisory offices. The idea is to organize a half-day symposium called "Mind & Drive," where experts in mental health and professional motivation offer workshops and talks to improve team well-being and productivity. This document includes a detailed description of the idea, a justification of why this solution is necessary, the link to access the recorded pitch, and a conclusion about the importance of this activity for my professional development. The entire pitch has been prepared following the appropriate structure: real-world problem, context, ideal solution, how to make it possible, and a call to action.

Description.

The activity consisted of recording an elevator pitch with a maximum duration of one and a half minutes, using a cell phone to capture audio in MP3 format. The content of the pitch is based on an innovative idea that seeks to solve a real problem in the workplace: the lack of emotional support and motivation among employees in financial advisory offices. The pitch follows a clear and proven structure. First, I introduce myself by name and profession to establish credibility. Second, I describe the real problem that affects the team's productivity and emotional health. Third, I provide context and present the ideal solution: a half-day symposium called "Mind & Drive." Fourth, I will explain how to make this solution possible with a small budget, a suitable space, and volunteer support from HR and team leaders. Fifth, I close with a clear call to action, asking for the opportunity to present the detailed budget and schedule, and provide my contact information. The recording was made in a quiet environment, ensuring good audio quality. After recording, the file was uploaded to a Google Drive folder with public access permissions so that the tutor can listen to it without restrictions. The total duration of the recording is approximately one minute and twenty seconds, complying with the established time limit.

Justification.

This solution is justified for several reasons. First, stress and lack of motivation are common problems in work environments, especially in financial advisory offices where employees face high pressure, demanding goals, and constant interaction with clients. According to the content reviewed in the course, a good elevator pitch must solve a real-world problem, and in this case, the problem is evident and affects both people and business results. Second, the proposed solution is practical and viable. Organizing a half-day symposium called "Mind & Drive" does not require a large budget; it needs speakers, a conference room, snacks, and volunteer support. This makes the project easy to implement in a short period. Third, the symposium directly impacts two key aspects for any company: employee well-being and productivity. When people feel emotionally supported, they perform better, collaborate more, and stay longer in the organization. Fourth, the elevator pitch format is ideal for presenting this type of idea because it allows me to capture the attention of decision-makers quickly and persuasively, respecting their limited time. Finally, using a recorded pitch in English demonstrates my communication skills in a global business language, which adds value to my professional profile as a financial advisor.

Elevator pitch:

Introduction (Who I am):

Hello, my name is Manuel, and I work as a financial advisor in one of our main offices. Every day, I see how stress and pressure affect my colleagues' performance and emotional health. That is why I am passionate about finding solutions that improve both our well-being and our productivity at work.

Real-world problem:

In our workplace, many employees feel stressed, unmotivated, or disconnected from their daily tasks, especially in high-pressure environments like financial advisory. This problem affects productivity, increases absenteeism, and reduces the quality of our team's work. We are losing talent because people do not feel emotionally supported at work.

Context and ideal solution:

After reviewing internal surveys and speaking with colleagues from different departments, I have identified that a lack of emotional support and motivation is the main issue. My solution is to organize a half-day symposium called 'Mind & Drive,' where experts in mental health and professional motivation will give workshops and inspirational talks to our team, specifically designed for financial professionals.

How to make it possible:

We can implement this symposium by requesting a small budget for speakers and snacks, using the main conference room on a Friday afternoon, and inviting volunteers from HR and team leaders to coordinate the activities. This requires minimal investment but offers great returns in employee satisfaction and retention.

Call to action and contact information:

My request is simple: allow me to present a detailed budget and schedule for this symposium next Monday. If you approve this pilot program, we can measure its impact on team morale and expand it to other departments. You can contact me at manuel.finance@email.com or call me at 555-123-4567. Let's build a healthier workplace together.

Conclusion.

In conclusion, this activity allowed me to integrate all the knowledge acquired during the Business English I course, especially the topics related to job interviews, professional communication, and project pitches. Developing and presenting an elevator pitch in English not only improved my speaking skills but also taught me to be more precise and persuasive when communicating business ideas. In my daily work as a financial advisor, the ability to present an idea in less than two minutes is extremely valuable because clients and managers often have little time to listen. This skill also helps me to be more confident in meetings, networking events, and even internal evaluations. Furthermore, the process of recording myself allowed me to identify areas for improvement in my pronunciation, intonation, and fluency, which will help me continue practicing and perfecting my English. On the other hand, the proposed solution —the "Mind & Drive" symposium— addresses a real need in the workplace: reducing stress and increasing motivation. If implemented, this project could significantly improve the quality of life for many colleagues. Finally, I consider that activities like this are essential for any professional who aspires to work in international environments, because English is the lingua franca of global business. I will continue practicing and applying these tools in my professional future.
